Jack lives in Erasmus Park. Each morning, he opens the window to fresh air and the smell of trees. He walks the brick path and feels the breeze. At night, it's quiet, with birds and streetlights around.

At 10 a.m., Jack woke up and pulled back the curtains. Morning light flooded the room as he looked out the serene window. He walked to the sink, washed up, put on some music, and then began answering emails. The day began slowly and calmly.

Every day, Jack opens his window to a view of trees and a riverbank. He hears birds chirping and the soft rustle of leaves as the wind moves through the trees.

Jack often starts his morning by playing one of his favorite songs, “Stargazing” by Myles Smith, while opening his laptop to check emails and review his schedule.

Inside the Erasmus Park, where there's a barbecue grill in the courtyard. On weekends, Jack often joins casual BBQ parties with friends, enjoying food, music, and relaxed conversations outdoors.

Erasmus Park is right next to the road, and Jack sometimes finds the constant traffic noise a bit too loud, especially during the day. It breaks the quiet but he's gotten used to it over time.

Rough

Living at Erasmus Park, Jack became more aware of textures around him. The granular feel of the asphalt underfoot, the sticky smoothness of the painted wooden table, the solid touch of the red brick walls, and the rugged surface of tree bark all formed a sensory map of his daily routine—quietly grounding him in place.

Next to Jack's Erasmus Park flat is a Tesco Extra, one of the places he visits most. It has everything he needs. Beside the store is a petrol station and car wash. The area is always busy with people and traffic.

Tesco Extra

At 11 a.m., Jack leaves his flat and walks to Tesco Extra to grab some drinks and snacks. The weather is warm and clear, so he decides to find a quiet spot for a picnic and enjoy some time in the sun.

Flakiness

Outside Tesco, the parking lot is full of people. Shoppers chat near their cars, loading groceries into trunks. There's the sound of car doors slamming and engines starting, adding to the steady movement and noise of the busy scene.

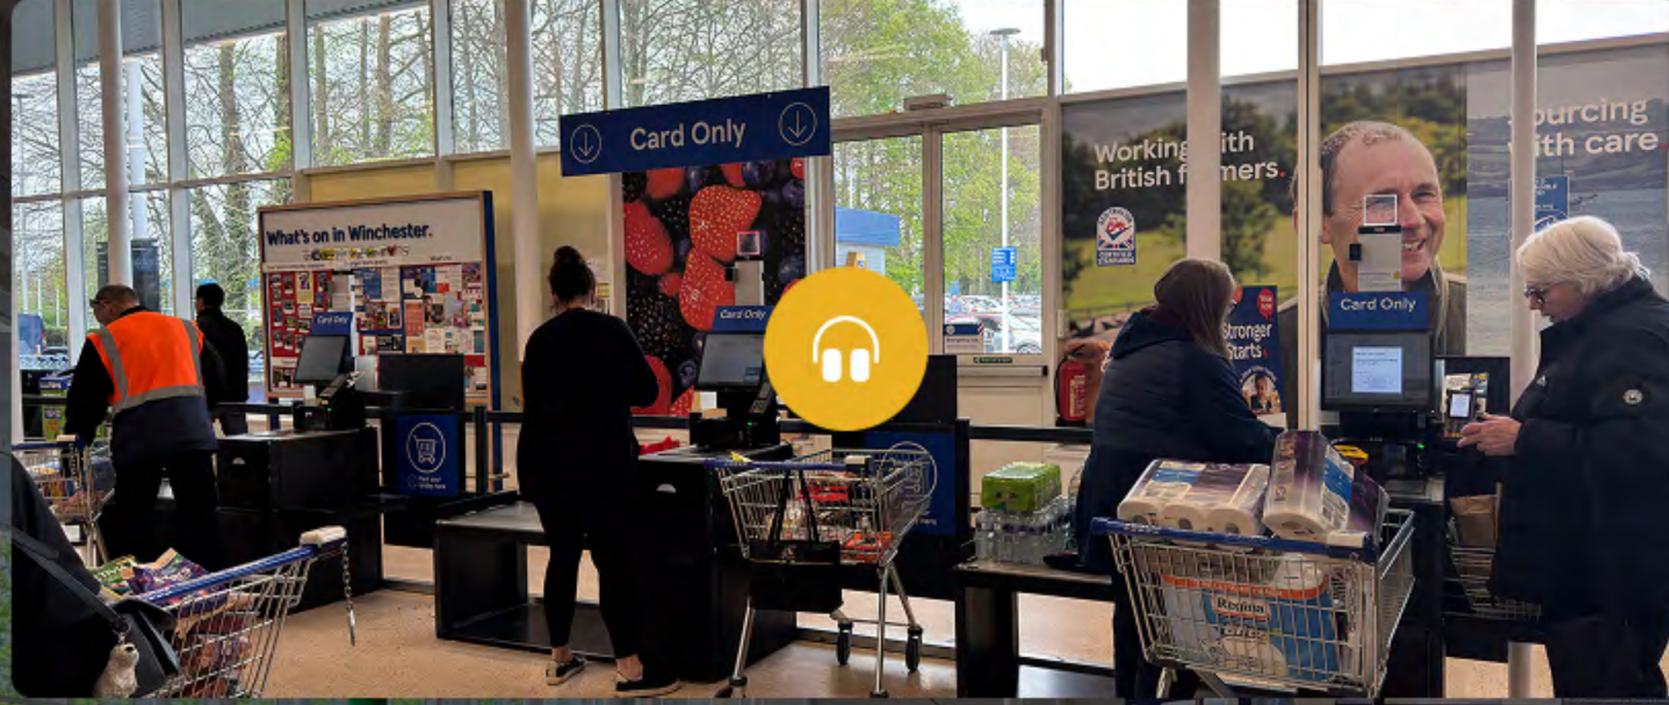

At Tesco's entrance, there's a cart area and a bakery. Shoppers bite into fresh bread, the sound of chewing mixing with the clatter of trolleys and the footsteps and laughter of children running around. It's lively and full of everyday noise.

In Tesco's snack aisle, sounds fill Jack's mind—the fizz of soda, the crunch of crisps, the soft rustle of plastic wrappers. Each sound triggers a craving, quietly pulling him toward the shelves, tempting him to grab more than he planned.

At Tesco's self-checkout area, a long queue has formed. The steady beep of scanners, the rustle of bags being filled, and the voices of staff assisting customers blend into a constant rhythm of motion and sound.

Decay

Flakiness

Jack's visits to Tesco come with familiar textures—the uniformity of the tiled floor, the clean industrial feel of metal pillars, the gentle decay of the wooden bench, and the flakiness of old paint and stickers. Together, they shape a lively, textured daily routine.

Moors Nature Reserve is a park near Jack's school, WSA. It has open grass fields, a tennis court, a kids' play area, a skate zone, and peaceful natural scenery—making it a great spot for relaxing, playing, or taking a quiet walk.

At 12 p.m., Jack leaves Tesco Extra and heads to Moors Nature Reserve. He finds a quiet spot to enjoy his lunch, watching children play nearby while taking in the peaceful scenery around him. It's a calm break in his day.

Just inside Moors Nature Park, to the left, is a children's play area filled with various equipment. Laughter and playful shouts echo as kids climb, swing, and run around, bringing energy and life to the park's entrance.

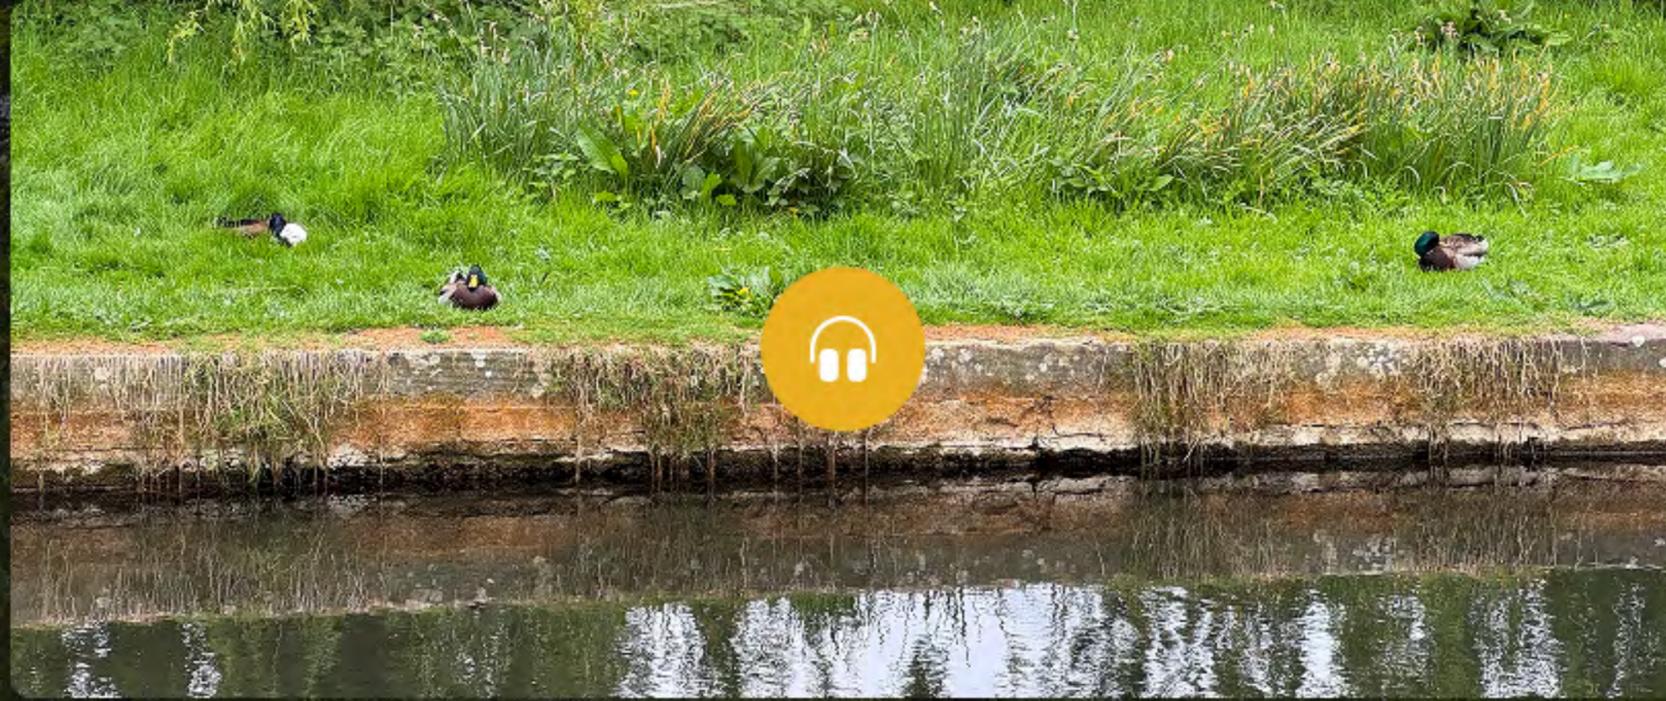

Just inside Moors Nature Park, to the right, there's a skate area with ramps and raised platforms. After school, teens gather there, joined by skaters finishing work, filling the space with movement, noise, and bursts of energy.

Deeper into Moors Nature Park, there's a large field with a rugby pitch. Joggers pass by, visitors relax, and dogs run freely, chasing each other. The sounds of footsteps, laughter, and barks create a calm, pleasant atmosphere.

Beyond the open field, a gentle stream flows, its soft water sounds blending with the quiet splashes of ducks swimming and their occasional calls. The scene feels peaceful and free, a quiet contrast to the energy of the rest of the park.

The park leaves Jack with lasting impressions—the rawness of climbing vines, the softness of petals and fallen leaves, the earthiness of the mossy stone bridge, and the vibrancy of purple graffiti—all adding energy and warmth to his daily walks.
